Corruption vs Development

Of the 134 countries that attended the 9th International Anticorruption Conference organized by Transparency International in Durban, over a hundred were developing countries. Yet the corruption problem still exists on a much larger scale than first perceived.

5 Several studies have therefore been undertaken in an attempt to find the root cause of the widespread problem of corruption. In most developing countries today, the widespread nature of corruption has made it part of everyday life. Society has learned to live with it, even considering it fatalistically, as an integral part of a country's culture. Not only are public or official decisions for instance, on the award of government contracts or the amount of tax due, bought and sold, but very often access to a public service or the exercise of a right such as obtaining civil documents also has to be paid for (...) Bribery wastes public resources, undermines development and distorts competition. Every 10 year an estimated US $ 100 billion is paid out in bribes worldwide. But, experts believe this may be just the tip of the iceberg and the problem is still very critical.

15 The battle against corruption is being thought everywhere, not just in the transition and emerging markets and developing countries but in developed economies also. Fighting corruption needs more than punitive laws. Improving ethics and governance at every level is essential. The fight against corruption is not the monopoly of the industrialized countries. Nor can recipes that have worked in other countries necessarily be applied to developing ones. More and more of these countries are expressing their resolve to combat corruption, echoing international initiatives. Civil society and the media can help by denouncing corruption and pressure on the government. But the real impediments 20 to the fight against corruption are as much the interests of the politico administrative apparatus as the fatalism and ignorance of the victims, maintained by a culture of fear nurtured by those who benefit from corruption. And there should also be tough stands from the West against home countries of multinationals that encourage corrupt practice.
