The Impacts of Domestic Violence on Society

Epreuve du 1<sup>er</sup> groupe

Domestic violence takes place every 24 minutes in the U.S. One in four women and one in seven men are victims of such violence. Increasingly, we are becoming aware of the scope of the domestic violence problem and the extent to which it can impact an individual's mental and physical health, and the overall mental health and well-being of a family. Stress, depression, and anxiety are common among survivors, and a significant majority of them is exposed to strokes, heart disease, asthma and substance abuse.

The ripple effects, unfortunately, don't stop there: Children who witness domestic violence can experience lifelong effects from poor performance in school to early death; domestic violence costs more than $5 billion in medical and mental health care each year, and an estimated 8 million days of paid work are lost annually because of domestic violence.

We all must come to terms with the prevalence of domestic violence and better understand the impact on families, society, and even our economy. We must also strongly support those who have experienced it and find ways to prevent it.

Domestic violence can involve psychological, verbal, sexual or economic abuse. Contributing to the isolation frequently experienced by victims, these forms of domestic violence can be difficult to spot. Abusers often exhibit warning signs, including jealousy, controlling behavior, isolation of their partners from friends and family members, hypersensitivity or being quick to anger, and cruelty toward animals or children.

Loved ones who may experience domestic violence also exhibit certain behaviors. Signs may include frequently being absent from school or work, exhibiting a sudden fear of conflicts, and frequently accepting blame for arguments or other situations at home or work.

As with many personal or family-related problems, there is a tremendous stigma that prevents victims from coming forward to share their experiences and to seek help. This stigma, along with overwhelming feelings of shame or embarrassment, can be particularly damaging for male domestic violence survivors. Men often don't want to be seen as weak and thus remain silent about their experiences.
